STORY OF KLEFTİGO (THİEF KEBAB) KEBAB

In Cyprus, the practice of thieves stealing animals and then slaughtering and cooking them led to this kebab being called "thief's kebab."

After slaughtering the lambs or kids they stole, the thieves dig a pit and build a base inside using carob and chinook wood.
Once the meat is charred, it is hung in the middle,
and new wood is added on top.

Finally, the pit is completely covered with the animal's skin. The pit is sealed airtight, and trees are used to cover it to prevent it from being noticed.

Then, the pit is completely covered with the animal's skin. The pit is sealed airtight, and trees are placed on top to prevent it from being noticed.

After 2-3 hours of cooking, the meat is ready to eat.

In Cyprus, this cooking method, where thieves stole animals and cooked them, has survived to this day, giving the dish its name, "thief's kebab."
Today, because it is cooked in ovens, it is also known as oven kebab.
